Researchers are preparing to begin work in the remote Himalayan region of eastern Tibet, a wilderness that includes parts of the provinces of Qinghai, Sichuan, Yunnan and Tibet. Key facts The entire region, bordering India, Nepal and Bhutan, has been identified as a biodiversity hotspot The area has one of the highest levels of religious and cultural diversity in the world It is home to more than 400 communities, each with its own language and culture The work will focus on the traditional knowledge of medicinal plants used by the Yak, Tibetan and other ethnic groups. "Research on the rich resources of traditional knowledge is vital to the sustainable use of these plants and our programme will develop tools to assist conservationists in accessing and using these data," said Dr Sarah Roberts, co-ordinator of the programme. "This is one of the most remote regions in the world and yet, at the same time, it is also rich in natural resources and the cultural diversity of the people who live there is extremely high. "The importance of traditional knowledge and the people who have knowledge of the plants is recognised by the government and the international community." Sustainability About 10 people from each of the communities will be selected as candidates to learn about the plants and their traditional use. After six months of training, they will produce a workbook for use by others and be encouraged to share their knowledge with their communities. "This is a chance for us to explore the diversity of medicines used by these people, understand how they have used these plants over centuries, and the health and social benefits of using traditional medicine," said Dr Roberts. A campaign to raise awareness of the project is already underway, with information being made available in Chinese, Tibetan, English and Russian, as well
