Where Lightroom has departed from the original design and interface of Photoshop, the new version departs more subtly. Both the main screen and the right sidebar have been redesigned, and some of the functions that were once scattered about have moved to the bottom of the interface, making it all more logical. Most of the commands are grouped in very broad categories, with controls that are renames of the old versions and functions that, while slightly less familiar, are now much more logical. Just one example is the Quick Fix. While a popular function in the previous version, it is now in the "Adjustments" category instead. Other refinements include the new and improved Layers panel, now with more options, including the ability to create an Instant Crop, a new Copy layer option, and the ability to merge layers. If you're used to Photoshop, you'll find that it's easy to adapt to Lightroom, but if you're not, the process will be a bit more painful, especially since the interface has changed a bit. For example, now the Layers panel acts more like the Layers panel in Photoshop. Where the ability to store multiple RAW file types (PEF, ARW, CCD) in Lightroom has enhanced, it's hard to find anything that could be considered a significant drawback. The only two things I found were that some of the guidelines in the Freeform Layers panel don't appear to be visible in Lightroom 5, and the timing could be improved when saving an image. Adobe Photoshop CC is probably one of the most "advanced" applications aimed at professionals. Since people are using the new version of Lightroom for the first time, the features are mostly geared at experienced users of photoshop, as they might be used to working on a larger number of images at once. Nevertheless, some of the features are quite simple, and once you get used to the interface, I dare say, you might even feel as if you could get away without the plug-in if you were extra careful. One use case where it simply saves having Lightroom is for Panoramas image that you want to edit. Using the "Filmstrip Crop" tool in Lightroom, simply mark what pixels represent the edges of the panorama and you have a nice, (almost) correct, panoramic image without any hassle. Granted that's not the same thing as a big, a crop, but it's still one less step and one less application required to create a perfect crop.

Q. How do you motivate your students? A. When I teach at Udemy, it is an amazing experience. I like to teach people who are interested in technology, so I always get the best out of people. If they have no idea what they want to learn, I will connect them with great courses to help them learn something through an online video series called 'Learn in 60'. For content driven people, I use a framework called the 4 hour content creator that helps people learn how to teach what they're learning. Q. What is the relationship between Udemy and the University of Victoria? A. The University of Victoria is where I am located, and it is my dream job. I started at the university as a Teaching Assistant and then moved up to Administrative Coordinator. At this job, I oversee an administrative team of about a dozen staff members. The list of duties goes on but there is an especially urgent need to re-build out a desktop platform at the moment. I'm totally behind the idea of teaching because it furthers my career, but I'm always too busy and don't get a chance to participate. However, I will admit that I may never get around to teaching because at this stage I hope to qualify for a permanent instructor position with the U of V or potentially one of the other nearby universities. Q. How do you define yourself? A. That's a difficult question. I'm no expert but I'm a hustler. I always have an interest in learning new things which I'm constantly acquiring experiences. I would define myself as a creative. I also have an obsessive personality. If I'm not interested, I will be distracted and never do it. That only feeds my creative aspect. I also enjoy teaching as an interesting way to communicate with people. e3d0a04c9c
